Cather's consciousness is not as clear a lesbian consciousness as the one enunciated here; yet the ending of Jim's narration seems to me sufficiently problematic for us to understand why Cather herself rejected both heterosexuality and maternity. Her text is not a simplistic pastoral but a complex reworking of the genre, in recognition of the impact of both the wilderness experience and ...

While Cather's writing style was poetic and beautiful, once the story took the "Jane Eyre" twist with the heroine, Thea Kronborg, unknowingly falling in love with a married man, I was disappointed. Realizing the story line reflects a different day and time, it was still harsh to read of several characters who remained "faithful" to their marriage vows just to maintain their respectability and ...
