"In Mother American Night: My Life in Crazy Times, a tender, scattershot memoir co-written with Robert Greenfield, the fact that Barlow, who died in February at 70, ‘nearly became America’s first suicide bomber’ is presented as a (thankful) near miss in a remarkably 'Zelig-like life.' It is probably time to retire that shopworn conceit, which invariably nudges biography toward name-dropping.

Mother American Night is an (admitted) ghostwritten autobiography of John Perry Barlow, founder of the Electronic Frontier Foundation, Grateful Dead lyricist, politician, and an important figure in the early days of the Internet. While this book is a nice and easy read, it flies through all of the events of Barlow's life very quickly without substantive descriptions of events, people, or reasoning.

For many, John Perry Barlow’s name might be inseparable from the digital advocacy work he did in the early days of the Internet. But the EFF co-founder’s impact—and adventures—spanned areas as diverse as Hollywood, politics, popular music, and environmental policy. His newly-released memoir, Mother American Night: My Life in Crazy Times, follows Barlow, who passed away earlier this year, from his upbringing in Wyoming as “ranching royalty,” through to the experience of writing ...
