Some people believe, wrongfully, that occupational therapy is just physical therapy that is related to your job and going back to work after an injury or surgery. Though the confusion is understandable, this 'type' of rehabilitation is technically worker's compensation or work conditioning/hardening, both of which PTs and OTs can perform.

The primary difference between physical therapy and occupational therapy is the different targets that each has for the patient. Physical therapy focuses on helping the patient move their body as a whole. Occupational therapy, on the other hand, focuses on the patient's ability to perform activities of daily living (ADL).

You can think of a physical therapist as a professional who works with you to restore gross motor function. He or she can help you get things moving properly. Your occupational therapist, however, is a professional who can help you regain functional mobility so you can perform the day-to-day tasks that life throws your way.
