Relationship Development Intervention (RDI) is a family-based, behavioral treatment which addresses the core symptoms of autism. It focuses on building social and emotional skills. Parents are trained as the primary therapist in most RDI programs. RDI helps people with autism form personal relationships by strengthening the building blocks of social connections.

Relationship Development Intervention (RDI) | Autism Speaks

Relationship Development Intervention® (RDI®) is customised for individual children. After an initial assessment, a consultant develops an individualised program for a child and trains the child's parents to implement it. The program is made up of teaching strategies and techniques that parents use on a daily basis with their child.

Relationship Development Intervention® (RDI®)

The activities focus on teaching the child how to see others as real people, develop a curiosity for social interaction, become a team member, and adapt in social settings. Although some initial activities are a little unorthodox, they are fun and designed to provide the scaffolding needed to teach relationship skills.

Relationship Development Intervention with Young Children ...

It is based upon Dr. Steven Gutstein's dynamic intelligence model which studied typical children and their ability to become competent in a world of social-emotional relationships. Relationship Development Intervention (RDI) is not considered a therapy, but rather an intervention that promotes developmental changes to occur over time by providing the skills an individual may need to understand and navigate challenges on their own. The RDI model involves an intensive parent training component.
