The speech pathologist is in the difficult situation of having to attend to the desires and wishes of their client in a client-centred manner whilst also having to work in an efficient 'SMART' fashion, validating their efforts via improvements, often on objective scales.

Speech pathologist perspectives on goal setting | Aphasia ...

When writing goals keep in mind that goals are supposed to be SMART: specific, measureable, attainable, relevant and timely. A pet peeve of mine are goals that say "the client will improve his receptive/expressive skills." These are not SMART: First of all they are not specific, but more, importantly, there is no measurable component in them.
