This House Of Grief by Helen Garner | Waterstones

This House of Grief, like Joe Cinque's Consolation, is procedural in its focus, the slow grinding progress of Farquharson's two court cases providing the book with its narrative spine. But the great edifice of the legal system is also depicted in these two books as a counterpoint to the fluidity and unresolvability of Garner's intimate concerns: an imposing and often puzzling symbol of sober rationality and order.

This House of Grief | Helen Garner | Review

This House of Grief is in many ways similar to The First Stone, Garner's controversial take on a university sexual harassment case, and Joe Cinque's Consolation, the more straightforward – though...

Garner describes the awe and the adrenalin she felt when she entered the Supreme Court of Victoria, “this house of grief”, and she sets the stage for the theatre that is a court case – wigs tilted forward, wigs tilted back, the tiny diamond stud in the lobe of the judge’s left ear. Her writing is almost painterly in these sections.
