People are often faced with decisions that involve weighing the lives of some people against the lives of others, or weighing lives against other goods. This book aims to develop a moral theory that can help with making these practical decisions. It is a theory of value, which includes an account of how good it is to extend a person's life, and also an account of how good it is to have new lives in the world — of the value of adding a new person to the world's population.
